Synthesis report from the High-level Panel Expert Policy Dialogue on Migration in the Post-2015 Development Agenda

On 26 February 2013, an Expert Policy Dialogue on the role of migration and mobility in the post-2015 Development Agenda was hosted by Swedish Minister for International Development Cooperation, Ms. Gunilla Carlsson. The meeting was called to review how migration and other related drivers of development could be integrated in the post-2015 development agenda.

The concept note and background paper made clear that migration is both transformative and one of the most powerful and immediate strategies for poverty reduction, at a global level and the individual level. Recognizing its importance in this regard, participants cited economist J.K. Galbraith, who has referred to migration as the oldest action against poverty for most of human history.1 The background materials highlighted that as a strategy for poverty reduction, economic modelling suggests that the gains from liberalizing freedom of movement for labour would be greater than the potential gains from further liberalization of the movement of goods or capital. For individuals, leaving a poor country for a richer one and finding work in their normal occupations is likely to multiply their incomes many-fold (a 15-fold increase in income; a doubling in education enrolment rate; and a 16-fold reduction in child mortality). Similarly, without internal migration we would not be experiencing the transformative urbanization that is taking place across the world.

The meeting, which took place in Stockholm, brought together panel members and/or members of their advisory teams (Indonesia, Liberia, Mexico and Sweden), other government representatives from Bangladesh, Canada, France, Germany, Moldova, Russia, Switzerland, United Kingdom and the United States, senior officials and experts from UN agencies, IOM and other international organizations as well as academics, think tanks and other civil society members. For a full list of participants see annex 2.

On the agenda (see annex 1), there was a key note speech on migration as a driver of development delivered by the UN Secretary General's Special Representative on Migration and Development, Peter Sutherland as well as an overview presentation on migration and development in the context of post-2015, by Director General William Lacy Swing of IOM. Other presentations included the post-2015 process and reflections on how migration fits within this, migration in development cooperation, the importance of migration for national development, a more in-depth presentation which focused on leveraging migration-driven remittances, skills and investments for development as well as a migrant perspective delivered by Father Flor Maria Rigoni from Casa del Migrante Albergue Belén, in Chiapas, Mexico. Intensive discussions drew on the expertise from the sixty-four experts that were gathered for the occasion. In the afternoon, participants broke up into groups exploring three broad topics: migration as an enabler and partnership for development, internal migration and urbanization for development and how to think about goals, targets and indicators for the contribution of migration to development goals.

Key messages from the meeting

The meeting established that migration is about much more than the one billion people who are migrants today (whether internally or internationally). Migration affects the family members directly and has a lot of spin-off effects on community members of those who remain – as remittances are used for local consumption or investments, as transnational networks generate trade between counties of origin and countries of destination, and as returning migrants bring back new skills and ideas to places of origin. It was also highlighted that migration is absolutely natural to the human condition. Oftentimes, migration is seen as the result of failed development. But migration has been a driver of human advancement throughout history and remains one of the most effective strategies for individuals and their families to improve their lives.

When reflecting on why the force of migration was left out of Millennium Development Agenda, it was highlighted that migration is a highly political issue, touching on national agendas, and in some cases juxtaposing state sovereignty of deciding who can enter, for how long and on what terms on the one hand and the human rights of all people to leave their countries on the other. Still, the meeting concluded that despite the political challenges, migration is a given fact that needs to be taken into consideration and that neglecting migration could render the future development agenda irrelevant.

It was suggested, therefore, that we should focus on quality, not quantity of migration. This is important both in order to find a politically viable proposal that could gain consensus and from a people-centred approach, that embraces the interests of migrants.

Options to include migration and mobility in the post-2015 development agenda included a narrative that acknowledges the contribution of migration to the development goals, as an enabler, and the formulation of partnerships to this effect. In essence, this implies a dual track approach which recognizes both the need for partnerships around migration, and the mainstreaming of migration in the efforts to achieve other development goals.

Regarding partnerships, it was also recognized that migration and mobility are global and national issues that requires cooperation within and between countries, as well as actors such as the private sector, civil society and local governments. Sketching on the building blocks of such partnerships, it was highlighted that no one should be forced to move, but people who choose to move in search for better life-chances should not be barred from doing so. Instead, those who move should be able to do so under conditions that expand their capabilities and with basic human rights guaranteed. For this to happen, Governments need to plan for handling the opportunities that migration brings and the challenges that arise. On the one hand, this means that development agencies and economic planning bodies need to adequately consider the effects of migration and mobility on development in their analysis, plans and programmes. On the other hand, it means that migration and labour ministries need to reflect on how migration can contribute to development. Finally, it was recognized that for partnerships to be meaningful, they need to be based on and support the specific goals that we set ourselves. They cannot be elaborated in the void.
